

Praying for the Women of West Africa

A Wolof woman kept having accidents working on a peanut farm in Senegal. She knew the spirits were angry with her, so she consulted the “marabout” (mare-ah-boo), a spiritual leader who blends Islam and mysticism. In exchange, he gave her an amulet inscribed with Arabic words from the Islamic holy book, the Qur’an (kor-an). The marabout told her to wear the amulet around her neck at all times. She has not taken it off, and is convinced it will protect her from evil spirits.

☞ Pray the women of West Africa will experience the freedom from fear found only in Jesus. Pray they will recognize the lies of false religious leaders and turn to the truth of the gospel.

In Burkina Faso, a Fulani woman rises early each morning to milk her cows. With a baby strapped to her back, she carries the milk on her head in a bowl made of a large, hollowed-out gourd. Each morning she makes the rounds so neighbors can buy milk by the ladle. On market day, she walks to market to sell milk or butter she’s made.

☞ Lift up the physical needs of women who work long, hard hours to provide for their family. Pray they will discover the true Bread of Life.

The mosque’s call to prayer pierces the darkness, waking the young Bambara woman in Mali. She rises to pound millet and cook breakfast. There are so many to feed – a mother-in-law, a husband, his two other wives, and all the children. It’s hard to find enough food because droughts often kill their crops. Her people follow Allah, the god of Islam, and she follows her people. They also worship the rivers, the trees, and ancestral spirits. There are so many spirits to appease!

☞ Pray West African women will come to know the One True God. Pray those who are already believers will remain strong in the face of persecution.

Praying for the Women of West Africa

A Wolof woman kept having accidents working on a peanut farm in Senegal. She knew the spirits were angry with her, so she consulted the “marabout” (mare-ah-boo), a spiritual leader who blends Islam and mysticism. In exchange, he gave her an amulet inscribed with Arabic words from the Islamic holy book, the Qur’an (kor-an). The marabout told her to wear the amulet around her neck at all times. She has not taken it off, and is convinced it will protect her from evil spirits.

☞ Pray the women of West Africa will experience the freedom from fear found only in Jesus. Pray they will recognize the lies of false religious leaders and turn to the truth of the gospel.

In Burkina Faso, a Fulani woman rises early each morning to milk her cows. With a baby strapped to her back, she carries the milk on her head in a bowl made of a large, hollowed-out gourd. Each morning she makes the rounds so neighbors can buy milk by the ladle. On market day, she walks to market to sell milk or butter she’s made.

☞ Lift up the physical needs of women who work long, hard hours to provide for their family. Pray they will discover the true Bread of Life.

The mosque’s call to prayer pierces the darkness, waking the young Bambara woman in Mali. She rises to pound millet and cook breakfast. There are so many to feed – a mother-in-law, a husband, his two other wives, and all the children. It’s hard to find enough food because droughts often kill their crops. Her people follow Allah, the god of Islam, and she follows her people. They also worship the rivers, the trees, and ancestral spirits. There are so many spirits to appease!

☞ Pray West African women will come to know the One True God. Pray those who are already believers will remain strong in the face of persecution.

